WOMEN OF THE WIGWAMS

THE American Indian woman is usually portrayed as an unhappy overworked person; the least important member of the tribe. According to many movies and stories, she remains in the background while the braves perform the important tasks. Nothing could be further from the truth.

In reality, both the men and women of the tribe had their allotted duties and tasks. The men hunted, fished, did the fighting, made the weapons, and performed other tasks. But it was necessary to the safety of the tribe that the men should not exhaust themselves by performing tasks which the women could do just as well. A battle or a long hunting trip took a great deal of strength out of the warriors, and they owed it to the safety of the tribe to rest themselves between battles or hunting trips. During these periods, they occupied themselves with making ceremonial dress ornaments, and repairing their fishhooks, bows and arrows.

The women were busy with other tasks. They had to take care of the children, sew clothing, clean and tan hides, make bead-work for themselves and their men, cook the meals and, in the case of agricultural tribes, cultivate their fields and gather the crops.

Among nomadic tribes, when it was necessary to move from one location to another, it was the women who attended to the tasks of taking down and setting up the wigwams and carrying heavy loads. This too might seem like an unnecessary burden upon the women, but it must be remembered that the men had to be free to protect the party from attacking enemies, to scout a trail and secure game—all duties which the men could not possibly perform if they were loaded down with baggage.

When an Indian man walked into a tepee or elsewhere ahead of his wife, he did not do so because of any feeling of superiority, but to safeguard her from any danger that might be lurking within.

The division of labor among the Indians seems to be quite similar to what it is among us in modern times. The Indian woman took care of the home, had the most to do with raising the children, and made sure that she had a good hot meal waiting for her husband when he arrived home after the day's labors.

We often hear or read about Indian princesses. The fact is, there never were princesses or royal families among the North American Indian tribes. It was the exception rather than the rule when a chief inherited leadership of a tribe. In most cases he was chosen because he had demonstrated bravery and prowess in battle or on the hunt, or because he proved himself to be a wise leader who could make good judgments concerning the welfare of the tribe.

But even in those cases where the chieftainship was inherited, the daughter of the chief did not become a princess, nor was his wife considered a queen. The wife and daughter probably received a certain amount of social superiority because of her relationship with the chief, but that was all.

In a large number of tribes where the clan system or descent by the female line was observed, as among the Iroquois and the Delawares, it was not unusual to have women chiefs or chieftainesses.

Perhaps the most famous of all Indian women to hold a position of leadership was a Creek Indian woman named Mary Bosworth, who caused a great deal of trouble for the colonial government of Georgia in 1752, and roused the Creeks to war against the British. Related to the chiefs of both the Upper and Lower Creeks, Mary proclaimed herself to be "Empress of the Creek Nation," and lay claim to vast areas of land. A large body of cavalry met the force under the "Queen's" command, but no battle was actually fought. Mary thought better of her demands, and accepted presents instead of the lands she sought. But she proved that a woman was just as capable of leading a tribe as a man.
