THE WORLD'S STRANGEST DOLLS

THE remarkable dolls being manufactured nowadays, and selling in department stores for considerable amounts, may strike us as the last word in dolldom. Actually, the ancients created dolls that were even more remarkable—and many of these can still be seen among primitive peoples.

Africa is producing some of the strangest dolls seen anywhere in the world today. The African toy dolls are made of wood, and sometimes of bone and clay. The Sudanese dolls are carved out of wood, but the heads and limbs are of clay.

In other parts of Africa, beads are used extensively. The Ashanti wooden dolls have hair made of beads, and the Basuto dolls wear many strings of beads. The Haussa dolls are made of wax, with glass beads used as nose ornaments. The Somali bone doll has a head of cloth, with eyes, nose and mouth formed by colored beads.

South Africa has originated an elaborate string of six performing dolls. These are connected by a thick leather thong. Native dolls at both ends of the thong cause the other dolls to perform a ritual dance.

Very strange are the Gold Coast dolls, made of a very light-colored wood. These are perfectly flat and shaped like a shovel. These dolls have no arms and legs.

Stranger still are the dolls of Zanzibar. The face and body of the Zanzibar doll is made of plaited palm leaves, while the arms and legs are cleverly made of nuts threaded together. The eyes and nose are made of stitched ribbon, and the decorations are supplied by beads.

Crudest of all African dolls are those the Kaffir children play with. The children make these dolls themselves out of clay. Roughly shaped, they are left to harden in the sun.

Some of the most ingenious dolls in the world are made by the Chinese doll makers. Chinese dolls are performers. Tumbling dolls are able to do intricate little gymnastic stunts, while the famous piano dolls dance when the piano is played. The secret of the piano dolls is in their skirts which are made of bristles which respond to the vibrations of the piano.

The early Japanese dolls were very crude, consisting of shaved willow sticks, with string or shavings for hair. But in time the Japanese became as skilled in the making of ingenious dolls as the Chinese.

A strange custom grew up among the poorer families. A child would carry a doll on its back, and, as the child grew older, the size of the doll was increased. This custom had a practical application, for when the child was 10 years old or so, it was able to bear the burden of a younger brother or sister on its back.

Japan produces two distinct types of dolls—the toy doll known as Kimona, and the doll in court dress known as the Gosho doll.

Unique to Japan, is the annual Doll Festival. Celebrated twice a year, once for girls and again for boys, these strange ceremonies have been observed for a thousand years.

For the three days of the festival, little girls wait on and cook for their little dolls. And at the end of the festival, the child is deemed ready to serve in her home as a hostess. As for the Festival dolls, they are carefully put away and handed down. It is not uncommon to find dolls that are generations old in some families.

Unquestionably, the oldest dolls in the world are those made by the ancient Egyptians. Many of these dolls are still in existence, but they can be seen only in European museums.

The Egyptian dolls are even more ingenious than some of our modern dolls. Cleverly put together, their arms could be made to move by hidden strings, while others could speak by means of bellows.

Some of the Egyptian dolls were made of wood, while others were made of clay with hair attached by means of asphalt. That these dolls were treasured is proved by the fact that many of them were unearthed when tombs were opened.

The children of ancient Rome played with dolls not very different from our own, making clothes for them as our modern little girls do. But the Italian doll makers of the 16th Century turned to puppet dolls, which became famous the world over. One particular puppet-doll became internationally famous as the troublesome little Pinocchio.

England gave the world the still popular printed rag doll. It is believed that these dolls were actually printed on the Continent and sent across the Channel in sheet form. People then bought these forms and made the dolls themselves.

In 1607, Sir Walter Raleigh sent the first doll to America as a gift to an Indian child. The doll was gorgeously dressed in Elizabethan costume, and must have delighted its owner.

But the Indian children were familiar with dolls before Sir Walter made his gracious gift. The earliest American dolls were crude, consisting of cornhusk and whatever decorations could be added.

Later on, the Indians themselves produced really beautiful dolls. Fashioned from leather embroidered with glass beads, little Dakota and Blackfoot Indian girls lavished loving care on their "babies."

Very interesting are the State dolls, which are made from materials common to the states which they represent. For instance, the Connecticut State doll is a nutmeg doll, while Louisiana State dolls represent the king and queen of the Mardi Gras.

The Mexican skeleton dolls are perhaps the strangest on our Continent. These are cleverly made from coiled wire, and are sold with small cakes decorated with tiny skulls.

Equally strange is the minute Mexican dressed doll that sits on the head of a pin or in the eye of a needle. A curious variation of this lilliputian doll world is the one that is carved out of a single rice kernel and lives in a dollhouse carved out of a husk shell.
