WOMEN WITH WAR WINGS

ALTHOUGH there were 2,733 women licensed as pilots in the United States in the middle of 1941, the American Air Force still lacked confidence in the lady birds. One top officer remarked that women were too high-strung for wartime flying.

Then, a famous American aviatrix, Jacqueline Cochran, wrote an urgent plea to the wife of the President, Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt. In her letter, Miss Cochran warned that in the field of aviation, the real bottleneck in the long run is likely to be trained pilots. By assigning women to "all sorts of helpful back-of-the-lines work," such as flying transport, courier, and ambulance planes, more male pilots could be released for combat duty.

Miss Cochran urged that her plan be carried out on a large scale, to include an ambitious training program.

A more modest program was put forward at about the same time by another famous aviatrix, Mrs. Nancy Harkness Love, who was employed in non-flying duties at the time by the Air Corps Ferrying Command. Mrs. Love's plan called for a small group of highly qualified women flyers to help fill the Command's growing need for ferrying pilots.

As it happened, both plans were put into effect, practically at the same time. In September, 1942, the Women's Auxiliary Ferrying Squadron (WAFS) was activated at New Castle, Delaware, under the command of Mrs. Love, while the Women's Flying Training Detachment, under the direction of Miss Cochran, was established in the Flying Training Command.

The divided command eventually led to confusion and on August 5, 1943 the WAFS and the women pilot trainees were merged into one organization, Women Airforce Service Pilots (WASP), with Miss Cochran becoming Director of Women Pilots, and Mrs. Love becoming WASP executive with the Ferrying Division of the ATC.

Even before the merger was completed, four squadrons of WAFS demonstrated that they were capable of handling the most difficult and heaviest planes in existence.

At the same time, thousands of applications began pouring in from girls throughout the country—and from other countries as well. To qualify, a girl had to be an American citizen, twenty-one to thirty-five years of age, have 200 hours flying time, and have a minimum height of 60 inches. Later on, the minimum age was reduced to eighteen and a half, and the height increased to 64 inches.

Training of the women pilots began in a school at a Texas airport in November, 1942. The first program of instruction, consisting of 135 hours of flying training and 180 hours of ground school, provided for a four-month course designed to qualify the pilots to ferry training-type Army aircraft. Except for the fact that the women were not training for combat, their course of instruction was the same as that for aviation cadets.

Although ferrying was the first and principal duty of WASPs, their usefulness was increased when decisions were made in the fall of 1943 to assign women pilots to the Training Command for operational duties.

The lady war birds proved, after flying about 60 million miles on operational duties, that women were as much at home in the sky as men.
